

select and fund their dictator rulers. The poverty of the Third World will soon be brought to the fast-failing First World nations, whose industry, social structure and work forces have been used by the banksters to implement their global plans. By brokering "capital" for the world's industrial growth, the banksters climbed to society's top tier, from which they are now able to buy and control all that lies beneath them. They are the new royal families, and the entire planet has become their playground.

While the First World nations prospered, they were able to enjoy "liberalism" and "democracy." These were largely illusions permitted by the banksters, who played the role of "lenders" in favor of social equality and prosperity for all. Globalization and free trade were sold to a gullible public as progressive strategies, along with a global "War on Terror" designed to cast Eastern countries and their people as repressive, barbaric, and envious of Western freedom. In fact, the bankers themselves, by way of intelligence agencies in their control, devised and staged ongoing acts of international terror, using their media outlets to blame innocent nations and an alleged global terrorist network serving them. The War on Terror, popularized by the banksters' global media, set the stage for government surveillance of citizens and state police powers that Western societies would not have accepted had they not been convinced that a faceless enemy and its worldwide agents were plotting to harm them. The terror attacks of 9/11 successfully catapulted and continue to feed this climate of fear.

Uniting all: The New World Order

Facing a common enemy gives people a feeling of unity. "We are more similar than different" is the banksters' current planetary theme, designed to set the stage for one world government. As nation states are dismantled and our environment is destroyed by corporations funded and protected by the banksters, the people of the world are being herded into Agenda 21 – a program of global control masquerading as a series of protocols for global "sustainability."

Unveiled in 1992 at the United Nations Earth Summit, Agenda 21 has been in the making for decades. It will regulate all facets of economic, political and social planning, including the production and distribution of food, water rights and usage, control of the environment, education, medicine and public health. With the planet "endangered" by the greed and errors of humanity, the masses will be convinced that tight regulation by global experts is the only way the world can continue on a safer, smarter, more "sustainable" course. This new platform will put nature above man, with people from all parts of the world giving up even more of their liberties for the sake of a green planet and livable future. Popular movements will merge their philosophies as sustainability becomes a common global goal, and nations will submit to world government for the sake of our global survival. Capitalism's rape of resources and exploding production will be replaced with global protocols of stringency and limitation; people will willingly sacrifice and do without. World poverty—the banksters' final card—will have become an accepted way of life, by mutual universal consent. All this will be known as the New World Order.

In a push toward "anti-capitalism," we are already being encouraged to simplify our lives and do without "stuff"—a social trend designed to normalize and placate for the dispossession of assets and property we will all soon experience. The creators of paper money will thus lay claim to our personal wealth along with our self-relinquished rights and freedom.

The Banksters: How paper money stole the world

In the old days, wealth was determined by ownership of land and possession of silver and gold. But things changed radically in the late 1700s with the birth of the Industrial Revolution: the many goods being produced created a need for markets (to buy them) and raw materials (to make them with). Paper money was being circulated to represent precious metals, which people could now store for safekeeping in private banks set up by the sons of Mayer Amschel Bauer, who changed his family name to Rothschild. Moving to the big cities of Europe as the world's first bankers, the Rothschild sons began the practice of fractional reserve lending—loans made in many times the amounts of their actual gold deposits—with interest charged on the loans. In this way, deposits brought the private banks a stream of profit, and the more money they lent, the more profit they made.

As industry grew, the bankers appealed to investors: people with money to buy raw materials and build factories and mills. There was great wealth to be made from manufacturing and the busy markets it was creating. An entirely new kind of economics had arrived: the management of capital in a time of booming production and sales. Capitalism was a dynamic economic system, in contrast to static land and gold ownership. "New wealth," created by anyone who could borrow and pay the loans back with interest, began to outpace and displace "old wealth" and the aristocracy that had owned it.

War: A new kind of opportunity

Capitalism changed the entire social class system. Banks and brokerage houses became very rich as they lent, managed and acquired the capital (money) that funded trade and goods production, going wherever new opportunities arose.

Aristocrats, tied to their land, lost their power and influence to the banking families who not only lent their new wealth to the royals, but also began to influence relationships between kings and countries—in order to fund and profit from the wars that ensued.

The world's top banking families, headed by the Rothschilds, have systematically built the world's empires, exploited them, crashed them (leaving them in ruin and debt), and moved on elsewhere to do so all over again. Witness the rise and fall of the Dutch empire, the British empire and now America. Bank-funded wars are major premeditated strategies and their most profitable ventures. There is money to be made from the loans that buy the weapons to destroy, as well as from the loans that fund the reconstruction of what has been destroyed. Funding both sides of a war enables the banks to make twice as much money. The "house" not only becomes richer, it can also choose the winner. The top banking families (the "banksters") can thus play and position world politics to create the outcomes they desire.

Staying behind the scenes

Ever clever and well aware that boom-and-bust cycles work best if the common people never know what (or who) is behind them, banking families—who have now become the world's elite—pull the strings of the world from far behind the scenes. They directly control the information we get (global media), international politics and local political parties, the stock markets, and most of the world's governments. By and through their international commissions, organizations, agencies and subgroups, they select our rulers, fund our politicians, and position their visible henchmen on executive levels to carry out their schemes, providing protection to such puppets or "taking them out" when necessary. The public falsely believes that presidents are elected and that the money in their wallets has value, yet neither is true. In fact, paper money is printed and circulated by the Federal Reserve, a Rothschild private bank set up in and for America; it is merely lent out to "revive the economy" when the bankers choose to do so. Theoretically, the amount of paper money printed does not exceed available goods and services so as to control runaway inflation. But the rising interest charged on the loans made to us by the banksters – money we are obligated to repay – keeps a steady inflation going. Because the money that constitutes "interest" is never printed and released into circulation, we must keep borrowing in order to pay the interest on our loans.

Demolishing capitalism

Bankers operate on a global scale, using nations and populations as pawns. Though the resources of a planet are finite, ways to extract returns from such resources are unlimited, especially if new schemes can be created to refresh the game and switch its components around. Globalization shifted production from countries with high wages to countries with low wages, increasing profit margins. Privatization shifted revenue that had gone to governments directly into the laps of investors. Derivative and currency markets whip up illusory "products" to buy and sell without creating anything in the physical world. The solid economic growth that industry once supplied with its real manufactured goods was deftly superseded by the buying and selling of a multitude of fictitious products that not only brought enormous wealth to those who traded them, but inflated the market value of the real goods themselves. When the common people at the bottom of the pyramid ran out of money to buy these overpriced goods and pay off their inflated mortgages and credit cards, the game came to a crashing halt: the financial crisis of 2008. The global money system was on its knees. Was this unforeseen? Not at all. The bankers are too smart for mistakes. Two centuries of real economic growth had been replaced by four booming decades of artificial growth, and now it was time for a period of profitable "recovery."

Capitalism is going through a deliberate, carefully managed destruction – a controlled demolition. When the banks received enormous bailouts from the U.S. government, their debt became the American people's debt. The effect of these bailouts across the world has been to lift insolvency from the banks and transfer it to the nations. When a nation falls into bondage by debt, it loses its sovereignty and is put under the control of the bankers' International Monetary Fund. Austerity is enforced and the functions of the state are handed over to private companies. This too is a controlled demolition – of the nation itself, whose government is left with only two tasks: police suppression of its outraged citizens and the collection of taxes (more money for the bankers). No wonder the CEOs of banks and brokerages paid themselves huge bonuses: the old game had ended but the pot was full again and a new game could begin!

From problem to "solution"

Nation states are in the process of being dismantled all over the world. Most Third World countries never had a chance to prosper, having fallen for interest-heavy loans from the banksters that were impossible to pay back (for "improvements" such as hospitals, roads and dams). As a result, their valuable natural resources are now taken over and "managed" by the bankers, who also
